In their articles, the media have continued to refer to the protesters as 'black' and the area of conflict between them and the police as a 'riot.' At the same time, the media claim that the movement has nothing to do with the rest of the country. The media have looked for the most negative, sensationalistic representation of the protestors, thus creating the impression that the movement is inferior and not serious, let alone legitimate. In reality, this movement is very familiar to the people of France and its values are widely shared. The French government has tried to appear more liberal and humane than it is. It has sought to achieve some very modest reforms in the workplace, by bringing in a little more freedom. It has also tried to avoid stirring up public anger by responding to real grievances. The movement is not just a series of isolated protests and acts of violence. It has actually set up a general movement against these reforms. It has organized massive protests every time the government is about to introduce a reform. It has seized the opportunity to protest every
